

Revitalizing Cultural Knowledge and Honoring Sacred Waters

Documenting the Oral History of the Life on the Nooksack River

The purpose of this work is to preserve the knowledge and to share the story of the Nooksack River from the perspective of the Lummi People who still fish and hold sacred the territory at the mouth of the river.

These are some stories of the people who lived at the Nooksack at various times over a few years, most homes were occupied by different families over the years. This is one video of more work to come, historical stories and sense of place of the Lummi People.

Recent NWIC Graduate:

Althea Wilson

Althea Wilson, Lummi tribal member and Native Environmental Science program at Northwest Indian College graduate, and focused on this project for her culminating project at the college for which she was backed by a grant from the National Science Foundation. Earlier this year, she earned first place in the undergrad division at the Salish Sea Ecosystem Conference for this research project.

Join Us

6-8pm

Friday
August 17th

Wexliem

